

Things to Know

There are risks you must be aware of prior to deciding if keeping poultry or rabbits is right for you.

Predators

Backyard poultry and rabbits commonly attract predators and other wildlife. Precautions should be taken in order to minimize the dangers of predator intrusions.

Ways to minimize the threat include:

1. From dusk until dawn, animals must be enclosed in a secure coop or hutch.
2. During daylight hours, animals shall have access to a run that is adequately fenced and protected from predators.
3. Keep in mind that predators can dig underneath facilities and runs. It is a good idea to construct enclosures so that wire mesh or other durable materials go underground as well.
4. Predators can also come from above, therefore a roof enclosure made of wire or other durable materials is recommended for both the coop/hutch and runs.
5. Store animal feed in a resealable, airtight, rodent-proof container.

Fire hazard

Coop fires can and do happen and can cause significant damage to your property if proper precautions are not taken.

1. Heaters should generally not be used in animal facilities as they pose a fire danger. If a heater is desired, it is recommended that it be installed by a professional electrician.
2. It is recommended that the facilities are not connected to the primary residence in case of fire.
